South Asia Textile Business Review

South Asia, one of the world's most populous areas, has several advantages in the manufacture of textiles and textile products. The production of cotton, an abundant labour force, the availability of water, proximity to emerging markets, and the availability of other raw materials and inputs have made the region an attractive place for the continued relocation of textile production to low-cost countries.

According to the ITMF, around 38m spindles and 38,000 shuttle-less looms have been shipped to South Asia since 2005 to further strengthen the textile manufacturing base. In addition, 30% of the world's cotton and 10% of its polyester fibres are now produced in the region.

Since the abolition of textile and clothing quotas from developing countries in December 2004, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh and Sri Lanka have been among the main beneficiaries of this change, while the Maldives and Nepal have lost out significantly.

India, for example, has made significant headway in the production of cotton fibre, doubling output since 2001 to become the world's second largest producer; Pakistan has doubled its textile and clothing exports over the past 10 years; Bangladesh's garment exports have increased by 170% since 2001–02; and Sri Lanka's textile and clothing exports have increased by 32% since 2004.

This new report will help you to identify:

- key trends, strengths and weaknesses of the South Asian textile and clothing industry
- trends in raw material sources
- the domestic market potential
- opportunities and threats for the region's textile and apparel sector
- current and future development strategies and programmes
